Durham, North Carolina

(By the Durham Chamber of Commerce)

Durham, in a peculiar sense, is truly a city of the new South. At this place, formerly known as Durham's Station, General Johnson surrendered to General Sherman, bringing to a close the war between the States. During the armistice soldiers of both the northern and southern armies are said to have pillaged the neighboring farms of tobacco, which they liked so well that when they returned to their homes they began to write for more of it. Largely in response to these early requests developed the great smoking tobacco and cigarette manufacturing plants which have made Durham famous the world over.

Later, capital earned in the tobacco business was invested in cotton mills, hosiery mills, flour mills, bag mills, and many other kinds of industries, until today the output of Durham manufacturing plants is valued at more than $140,000,000.00 per year, and there are employed in these plants more than fourteen thousand wage earners.

As industry prospered, and wealth was created, great philanthropists arose, who contributed large gifts to the public welfare, and as a result Durham is an unusually fine place in which to live and rear a family.

The city is served by five railroad lines, radiating in seven directions. These railroads afford unusually efficient freight facilities. Durham is on the National and Central highways, the principal routes between the north and south, and the east and west. The transportations facilities of this city are unexcelled.

The hospital and educational facilities of Durham are excelled by no other city of its size anywhere. Grouped around Durham, within a radius of twenty-five miles, are the leading educational institutions of North Carolina, including the University of North Carolina, the oldest state-supported State University in America, and Duke University, with a physical plant valued at more than $20,000,000.00, and an endowment which enables it to rank among the leading universities of America. In connection with Duke University, a great medical college and hospital have been built, which makes Durham the outstanding medical and hospital center of the south.

Durham is a city of fifty-two thousand people, with an exceptionally healthful climate, and with all the public utilities and facilities needed by a modern community. It offers an attractive location for industries, as it has an industrial history of marked success, based on an adequate and suitable supply of intelligent American-born labor, splendid transportation facilities, abundant low-priced electric power, and proximity to source of supply, as well as the markets of the world.

The social, fraternal and religious life of Durham is abundant and diversified. There are seventy-one churches; a great many fraternal organizations; a number of civic, business and social clubs, offering diversion, entertainment and healthful exercises for all of its citizens.

A visit to the south is incomplete, and a knowledge of its agricultural and industrial life lacking, until one has visited Durham.
